For the Little Folks.

A certain peasant had a trusty dog called Sultan, who had grown quite old in his service, and had fost all his teeth, so that he could not hold anything fast. One day the pensant stood with his wife at the house door and said, "this morning I shall shoot old Sultan, for he is no longer of any use." His wife, however, compassionating the poor animal, replied, "Well, since he has served us so long and so faithfully, I think we may very well afford him food for the rest of his life." "Kh, what!" replied her husband; "you are not very clever; he has not a tooth in his head, and never a thief is afraid of him, so he must trot off. If he has served us, he has also received every day his dinner."

The poor Dog, lying stretched out in the aun not far from his master, heard all he said, and was much troubled at Jearning that the morrow would be his last day. He had one good friend, the Wolf in the forest, to whom he slipped at evening and complained of the sad fate which awaited him. "Be of good courage, my father," said the Wolf; "I will help you out of your trouble. 1 have just thought of something. Early to-morrow morning your master goes havmaking with his wife, and they will take with them their child, because no one will be left in the house. And while they are at work they will put him behind the hedge in the shade, and set you by to watch him.
